THINGS TO KNOW BEFORE YOU USE THE COMMUTING DATA

1. The Census question that produced these data asked where people worked last week, not where they usually worked. Thus it's entirely possible that a person who normally works in Northumberland County but who took a once-a-year business trip to Colorado is listed as working in Denver.
2. The data include the military, who may be stationed at a base for a long time but still claim residence elsewhere.
3. The commuting data are sample (long-form) data that are statistically inflated to reflect the total population. The methods for doing so sometimes don't work well for small numbers. For example, if one person from Wise County worked in Fairfax County during the week before April 1, 2000, the statistical inflation process could have artificially inflated that figure to five or six people.
4. If the question was not answered, the Census Bureau finds another person with similar characteristics and imputes that person's response to the person who didn't answer. Often this imputation process works very well, but occasionally it does not.
5. The data include only people who worked during the week preceding the Census. People who were out sick, on vacation, on strike, or didn't work for some other reason aren't represented.
6. A percentage of 0.00 can often reflect one or more people, especially if the population is relatively large.

THINGS TO KNOW BEFORE YOU USE THE COMMUTING DATA

1. The Census question that produced these data asked where people worked last week, not where they usually worked. Thus it's entirely possible that a person works in Northumberland County but who took a once-a-year business trip to Colorado is listed as working in Denver.
2. The data include the military, who may be stationed at a base for a long time but still claim residence elsewhere.
3. The commuting data are sample (long-form) data that are statistically inflated to reflect the total population. The methods for doing so sometimes don't work well numbers. For example, if one person from Wise County worked in Fairfax County during the week before April 1, 2000, the statistical inflation process could have inflated that figure to five or six people.
4. If the question was not answered, the Census Bureau finds another person with similar characteristics and imputes that person's response to the person who did. Often this imputation process works very well, but occasionally it does not.
5. The data include only people who worked during the week preceding the Census. People who were out sick, on vacation, on strike, or didn't work for some other represented.
6. A percentage of 0.00 can often reflect one or more people, especially if the population is relatively large.
